The impact of the first wave of the epidemic was strong and unexpected, finding government institutions and the population unprepared. The second wave in Autumn 2020 found the country unprepared in terms of hospital facilities and logistical mechanisms for managing the impact of the growing number of infected. In addition to the huge economic damage caused by the lockdown, which will have consequences in subsequent years and affect future generations such as the lack of economic growth in the country and the increase in public debt, the epidemic has also had a dramatic impact on people's health, causing many deaths, especially among the elderly and vulnerable people with co-morbidities, it has negatively influenced the mental health of many, especially health workers who have been fighting the consequences of the epidemic on the front line, and it has had a significant impact on the quality and stability of interpersonal relationships.
